LAST week it was reported that 47 per cent of Scots still remain undecided about how they are going to vote - thus influencing a large part of the election result.

We went out to the streets of Alloa to ask the undecided voters what they think will be the most important factor in determining their decision.

About half of those asked said that they were undecided because they weren't interested in politics or didn't plan to vote at all this year - citing reasons such as losing faith in the parties, becoming fed up with all of the media hype and becoming tired of being told lies.

William Campbell, from Alloa, said: "I'm definitely not voting SNP since I don't want partition. I usually vote Conservative, but I'm most likely to vote Labour this time around."

Michael Brown, from Tillicoultry, said: "I'm undecided, but the major factor that will influence my vote will be pensions.

"Both the age and the price seems to increasingly be going up."

Coraleigh Johnstone, who is also from

Alloa, said: "Employment will probably be the biggest issue to determine my vote since I'm a college student who will be looking into career paths soon and getting a job."

Carol Elliot, from Sauchie, said: "I'm not sure who I'm going to vote for, but employment would be the biggest issue for me. There is just not enough jobs and I know some people who have really struggled to get employment."

Dom Robertson, also from Alloa, said: "No I don't know who I'm voting for because I can't fathom it all out. They keep giving promises when I want facts. I'd like a rise in my pension too."
